Viśva-karman, n. (only ibc.) every action, MaitrUp.; Vās.; (viśvā-), mfn. accomplishing or creating everything, RV.; AV.; Br.; MBh.; Hariv.; m. 'all-doer, all-creator, all-maker', N. of the divine creative architect or artist (said to be son of Brahmā, and in the later mythology sometimes identified with Tvashṭri, q.v.), he is said to have revealed the Sthāpatya-veda, q.v., or fourth Upa-veda, and to preside over all manual labours as well as the sixty-four mechanical arts [whence he is worshipped by Kārus or artisans]; in the Vedic mythology, however, the office of Indian Vulcan is assigned to Tvashṭri as a distinct deity, Viśva-karman being rather identified with Prajā-pati [Brahmā] himself as the creator of all things and architect of the universe; in the hymns RV. x, 81; 82 he is represented as the universal Father and Generator, the one all-seeing God, who has on every side eyes, faces, arms, and feet; in Nir. x, 26 and elsewhere in the Brāhmaṇas he is called a son of Bhuvana, and Viśva-karman Bhāvana is described as the author of the two hymns mentioned above; in the MBh. and Hariv. he is a son of the Vasu Prabhāsa and Yoga-siddhā; in the Purāṇas a son of Vastu, and the father of Barhishmati and Samjñā; accord. to other authorities he is the husband of Ghṛitaci; moreover, a doubtful legend is told of his having offered up all beings, including himself, in sacrifice; the Rāmāyaṇa represents him as having built the city of Laṅkā for the Rākshasas, and as having generated the ape Nala, who made Rāma's bridge from the continent to the island; the name Viśva-karman, meaning 'doing all acts', appears to be sometimes applicable as an epithet to any great divinity), RV. &c. &c.; N. of Sūrya or the Sun, Vās.; MarkP.; of one of the seven principal rays of the sun (supposed to supply heat to the planet Mercury), VP.; of the wind, RV. xv, 16 (Mahīdh.); N. of a Muni, L.; (also with śāstrin) N. of various authors, Cat.

Viśvā-mitra, m. (prob.) 'friend of all', N. of a celebrated Rishi or Sage (having the patr. Gāthina, Gādheya, and Jāhnavā; he was at first a functionary, together with Vasishṭha, of Su-dās, king of the Tṛitrus; seeing V^o preferred by the king, he went over to the Bharatas, but could not prevent their being defeated by Su-dās, although he caused the waters of the rivers Vipāś and Sūtudri to retire and so give the Bharatas free passage, RV. iii, 33; he was born as a Kshatriya, deriving his lineage from an ancestor of Kuśika, named Purū-ravas, of the lunar race of kings, and himself sovereign of Kanyā-kubja or Kanoj; his fame rests chiefly on his contests with the great Brāhmaṇ Vasishṭha, and his success in elevating himself, though a Kshatriya, to the rank of a Brāhmaṇ, see Manu vii, 42; the Rāmāyaṇa, which makes him a companion and counsellor of the young Rāma-caudra, records [i, 51–65] how Viśvāmitra, on his accession to the throne, visited Vasishṭha's hermitage, and seeing there the cow of plenty [probably typical of go, 'the earth'], offered him untold treasures in exchange for it, but being refused, prepared to take it by force; a long contest ensued between the king and the saint [symbolical of the struggles between the Kshatriya and Brāhmaṇical classes], which ended in the defeat of Viśvāmītra, whose vexation was such that, in order to become a Brāhmaṇa and thus conquer his rival, he devoted himself to intense austerities [during which he was seduced by the nymph Menakā and had by her a daughter, Śakuntalā], gradually increasing the rigour of his mortification through thousands of years, till he successively earned the titles of Rājārshi, Rishi, Maharshi, and finally Brahmarshi; he is supposed to be the author of nearly the whole of RV. iii, and of ix, 67, 13-15; x, 137, 5; 167; moreover, a law-book, a Dhanurveda, and a medical wk. are attributed to him), RV. &c. &c.; a partic. विष्णु vishṇu (dat. vishṇāya = vishṇave), Pañcar. (wrong form used by uneducated persons).

विष्णापू vishṇāpū, m. N. of a son of Viśvaka, RV.

विष्णु vishṇu, m. (prob. fr. √vish, 'All-pervader' or 'Worker') N. of one of the principal Hindu deities (in the later mythology regarded as 'the preserver,' and with Brahṁā 'the creator' and Śiva 'the destroyer,' constituting the well-known Tri-mūrti or triad; although Vishṇu comes second in the triad he is identified with the supreme deity by his worshippers; in the Vedic period, however, he is not placed in the foremost rank, although he is frequently invoked with other gods (esp. with Indra, whom he assists in killing Vṛitra and with whom he drinks the Soma juice; cf. his later names Indrānuja and Upendra); as distinguished from the other Vedic deities, he is a personification of the light and of the sun, esp. in his striding over the heavens, which he is said to do in three paces [see tri-vikrama and cf. bali, vāmana], explained as denoting the threefold manifestations of light in the form of fire, lightning, and the sun, or as designating the three daily stations of the sun in his rising, culminating, and setting; Vishṇu does not appear to have been included at first among the Ādityas [q.v.], although in later times he is accorded the foremost place among them; in the Brāhmaṇas he is identified with sacrifice, and in one described as a dwarf; in the Mahā-bhārata and Rāmāyaṇa he rises to the supremacy which in some places he now enjoys as the most popular deity of modern Hindū worship; the great rivalry between him and Śiva [cf. Vaishṇava and Śaiva] is not fully developed till the period of the Purāṇas: the distinguishing feature in the character of the Post-vedic Vishṇu is his condescending to become incarnate in a portion of his essence on ten principal occasions, to deliver mankind from certain great dangers [cf. avatāra and IW. 327]; some of the Purāṇas make 22 incarnations, or even 24, instead of 10; the Vaishṇavas regard Vishṇu as the supreme being, and often identify him with Nārāyaṇa, the personified Puruṣa or primeval living spirit [described as moving on the waters, reclining on Śeṣha, the serpent of infinity, while the god Brahṁā emerges from a lotus growing from his navel; cf. Manu i, 10]; the wives of Vishṇu are Aditi and Sinivālī, later Lakṣmī or Śrī and even Sarasvatī; his son is Kāma-deva, god of love, and his paradise is called Vaikuṇṭha; he is usually represented with a peculiar mark on his breast called Śrī-vatsa, and as holding a śankha or conch-shell called Pāñcajanya, a cakra or quoit-like missile-weapon called Su-darśana, a gada or club called Kaumodaki, and a padma or lotus; he has also a bow called Śārṅga, and a sword called Nandaka; his vāhana or vehicle is Garuḍa, q.v.; he has a jewel on his wrist called Syamantaka, another on his breast called Kaustubha, and the river Ganges is said to issue from his foot; the demons slain by him in his character of 'preserver from evil,' or by Kṛṣṇa as identified with him, are Madhu, Dhenuka, Cāṇūra, Yamala, and Arjuna [see yamalārjuna], Kālā-nemi, Haya-grīva, Śakata, Arishta, Kaiṭabha, Kaṇsa, Keśin, Mura, Śālva, Mainda, Dvi-vida, Rāhu, Hiranya-kaśipu, Bāṇa, Kāliya, Narakā, Bali; he is worshipped under a thousand names, which are all enumerated in MBh. xiii, 6950-7056; he is sometimes regarded as the divinity of the lunar mansion called Śravaṇa, RV. &c. &c. (cf. RTL. 44; IW. 324); N. of the month Caitra, VarBṛS.; (with Prajāpatya) of the author of RV. x, 84; of a son of Manu Sāvarka and Bhautya, Mārkaṇḍeya; of the writer of a law-book, Yājñi.; of the father of the 11th Arhat of the present Avasarpinī, L.; (also with ganaka, kavi, daivajña, pañḍita, bhaṭṭa, mītra, yathindra, vājapeyīn, śāstrīn &c.) of various authors and others, Inscr.; Cat.; = agui, L.; = vasu-devatā, L.; = śuddha, L.; f. वेद 1. veda, m. (fr. √1. vid, q. v.) knowledge, true or sacred knowledge or lore, knowledge of ritual, RV.; AitBr.; N. of certain celebrated works which constitute the basis of the first period of the Hindū religion (these works were primarily three, viz. 1. the Rig-veda, 2. the Yajur-veda [of which there are, however, two divisions, see taittirīya-saṃhitā, vājasaneyi-saṃhitā], 3. the Sāma-veda; these three works are sometimes called collectively trayī, 'the triple Vidyā' or 'threefold knowledge', but the Rig-veda is really the only original work of the three, and much the most ancient [the oldest of its hymns being assigned by some who rely on certain astronomical calculations to a period between 4000 and 2500 B.C., before the settlement of the Āryans in India; and by others who adopt a different reckoning to a period between 1400 and 1000 B.C., when the Āryans had settled down in the Panjāb]; subsequently a fourth Veda was added, called the Atharva-veda, which was probably not completely accepted till after Manu, as his law-book often speaks of the three Vedas—calling them trayam brahma sanātana, 'the triple eternal Veda', but only once [xi, 33] mentions the revelation made to Atharvan and Aṅgiras, without, however, calling it by the later name of Atharva-veda; each of the four Vedas has two distinct parts, viz. 1. Mantra, i.e. words of prayer and adoration often addressed either to fire or to some form of the sun or to some form of the air, sky, wind &c., and praying for health, wealth, long life, cattle, offspring, victory, and even forgiveness of sins, and 2. Brāhmaṇa, consisting of Vidhi and Artha-vāda, i.e. directions for the detail of the ceremonies at which the Mantras were to be used and explanations of the legends &c. connected with the Mantras [see brāhmaṇa, vidhi], both these portions being termed Śruti, revelation orally communicated by the Deity, and heard but not composed or written down by men [cf. I. W. 24 &c.], although it is certain that both Mantras and Brāhmaṇas were compositions spread over a considerable period, much of the latter being comparatively modern; as the Vedas are properly three, so the Mantras are properly of three forms, 1. Ric, which are verses of praise in metre, and intended for loud recitation; 2. Yajus, which are in prose, and intended for recitation in a lower tone at sacrifices; 3. Sāman, which are in metre, and intended for chanting at the Soma or Moon-plant ceremonies, the Mantras of the fourth or Atharva-veda having no special name; but it must be borne in mind that the Yajur and Sāma-veda hymns, especially the latter, besides their own Mantras, borrow largely from the Rig-veda; the Yajur-veda and Sāma-veda being in fact not so much collections of prayers and hymns as special prayer- and hymn-books intended as manuals for the Adhvaryu and Udgātṛi priests respectively [see yajur-veda, sāma-veda]; the Atharva-veda, on the other hand, is, like the Rig-veda, a real collection of original hymns mixed up with incantations, borrowing little from the Rig and having no direct relation to sacrifices, but supposed by mere recitation to produce long life, to cure diseases, to effect the ruin of enemies &c.; each of the four Vedas seems to have passed through numerous Śākhas or schools, giving rise to various recensions of the text, though the Rig-veda is only preserved in the Śākala recension, while a second recension, that of the Bhāṣkalas, is only known by name; a tradition makes Vyāsa the compiler and arranger of the Vedas in their present form: they each have an Index or Anukramaṇī [q. v.], the principal work of this kind being the general Index or Sarvānukramaṇī [q. v.]; out of the Brāhmaṇa portion of the Veda grew two other departments of Vedic literature, sometimes included under the general name Veda, viz. the strings of aphoristic rules, called Sūtras [q. v.], and the mystical treatises on the nature of God and the relation of soul and matter, called Upanishad [q. v.], which were appended to the Āraṇyakas [q. v.], and became the real Veda of thinking Hindūs, leading to the Darśanas or systems of philosophy; in the later literature the name of 'fifth Veda' is accorded to the Itihāsas or legendary epic poems and to the Purāṇas, and certain secondary Vedas or Upa-vedas [q. v.] are enumerated; the Vedāṅgas or works serving as limbs [for preserving the integrity] of the Veda are explained under vedāṅga below: the only other works included under the head of Veda being the Parīśiṣṭas, which supply rules for the ritual omitted in the Sūtras; in the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka Upanishad the Vedas are represented as the breathings of Brahmā, while in some of the Purāṇas the four Vedas are said to have issued out of the four mouths of the four-faced Brahmā and in the Vishṇu-Purāṇa the Veda and Vishṇu are identified), RTL. 7 &c.; IW. 5; 24 &c.; N. of the num-

1. Vēdas, n. (for 2. see p. 1017, col. 3) knowledge, science, RV. (cf. keta, jāta, viśva-v).

Vedāṅga, n. 'a limb (for preserving the body) of the Veda', N. of certain works or classes of works regarded as auxiliary to and even in some sense as part of the Veda, (six are usually enumerated [and mostly written in the Sūtra or aphoristic style]; 1. Śikshā, 'the science of proper articulation and pronunciation', comprising the knowledge of letters, accents, quantity, the use of the organs of pronunciation, and phonetics generally, but especially the laws of euphony peculiar to the Veda [many short treatises and a chapter of the Taittirīya-Āraṇyaka are regarded as the representatives of this subject; but other works on Vedic phonetics may be included under it, see prātisākhya]; 2. Chandas, 'metre' [represented by a treatise ascribed to Piṅgala-nāga, which, however, treats of Prakṛit as well as Saṅskṛit metres, and includes only a few of the leading Vedic metres]; 3. Vyākaraṇa, 'linguistic analysis or grammar' [represented by Pāṇini's celebrated Sūtras]; 4. Nirukta, 'explanation of difficult Vedic words' [cf. yāska]; 5. Jyotiṣa, 'astronomy', or rather the Vedic calendar [represented by a small tract, the object of which is to fix the most auspicious days for sacrifices]; 6. Kalpa, 'ceremonial', represented by a large number of Sūtra works [cf. sūtra]; the first and second of these Vedāṅgas are said to be intended to secure the correct reading or recitation of the Veda, the third and fourth the understanding of it, and the fifth and sixth its proper employment at sacrifices: the Vedāṅgas are alluded to by Manu, who calls them, in iii, 184, Pravacanas, 'expositions', a term which is said to be also applied to the Brāhmaṇas, IW. 145 &c. — tirtha, m. N. of an author, Cat. — tva, n. the nature or condition of a Vedāṅga, Sarvad. — rāya, m. N. of various authors (esp. of the son of Tigulā-bhaṭṭa and father of Nandikēśvara, who wrote for Shah Jehān the Parāst-prakāśa and the Śrāddha-dīpikā, A. D. 1643). — śāstra, n. the doctrine of the Vedāṅgas, Jyot. Vedāṅgin, m. one who studies or teaches the Vedāṅgas, MW.

Vedānta, m. end of the Veda (= 'complete knowledge of the Veda,' cf. vedānta-ga), TĀr.; MBh.; N. of the second and most important part of the Mīmāṃsā or third of the three great divisions of Hindū philosophy (called Vedānta either as teaching the ultimate scope of the Veda or simply as explained in the Upanishads which come at the end of the Veda; this system, although belonging to the Mīmāṃsā [q. v.] and sometimes called Uttara-mīmāṃsā, 'examination of the later portion or jñāna-kāṇḍa [q. v.] of the Veda,' is really the one sole orthodox exponent of the pantheistic creed of the Hindūs of the present day—a creed which underlies all the polytheism and multimorph mythology of the people; its chief doctrine [as expounded by Śaṅkara] is that of Advaita i. e. that nothing really exists but the One Self or Soul of the Universe called Brahman [neut.] or Paramātmān, and that the Jīvātman or individual human soul and indeed all the phenomena of nature are really identical with the Paramātmān, and that their existence is only the result of Ajñāna [otherwise called Avidyā] or an assumed ignorance on the part of that one universal Soul which is described as both Creator and Creation; Actor and Act; Existence, Knowledge and Joy, and as devoid of the three qualities [see guṇa]; the liberation of the human soul, its deliverance from transmigration, and re-union with the Paramātmān, with which it is really identified, is only to be effected by a removal of that ignorance through a proper understanding of the Vedānta; this system is also called Brahma-mīmāṃsā and Śāriraka-mīmāṃsā, 'inquiring into Spirit or embodied Spirit': the founder of the school is said to have been Vyāsa, also called Bādarāyaṇa, and its most eminent teacher was Śaṅkarācārya, Up.; MBh. &c.; (ās), m. pl. the Upanishads or works on the Vedānta philosophy, Kull. on Mn. vi, 83. — kāṭaka, m., kāthā-ratna, n. शिव śivā, mf(ā)n. (according to Un. i, 153, fr. √1. śi, in whom all things lie; perhaps connected with √śvi, cf. śavas, śivā) auspicious, propitious, gracious, favourable, benign, kind, benevolent, friendly, dear (ām, ind. kindly, tenderly), RV. &c. &c.; happy, fortunate, BhP.; m. happiness, welfare (cf. n.), R. v, 56, 36; liberation, final emancipation, L.; 'The auspicious one,' N. of the integrating or destroying and reproducing deity (who constitutes the third god of the Hindū Trīmūrti of Triad, the other two being Brahmā 'the creator' and Viṣṇu 'the preserver'; in the Veda the only N. of the destroying deity was Rudra 'the terrible god,' but in later times it became usual to give that god the euphemistic N. Śiva 'the auspicious' [just as the Furies were called Eumenides 'the gracious ones'], and to assign him the office of creation and reproduction as well as dissolution; in fact the preferential worship of Śiva as developed in the Purāṇas and Epic poems led to his being identified with the Supreme Being by his exclusive worshippers [called Śaivas]; in his character of destroyer he is sometimes called Kāla 'black,' and is then also identified with 'Time,' although his active destroying function is then often assigned to his wife under her name Kālī, whose formidable character makes her a general object of propitiation by sacrifices; as presiding over reproduction consequent on destruction Śiva's symbol is the Liṅga [q. v.] or Phallus, under which form he is worshipped all over India at the present day; again one of his representations is as Ardha-nārī, 'half-female,' the other half being male to symbolize the unity of the generative principle [RTL. 85]; he has three eyes, one of which is in his forehead, and which are thought to denote his view of the three divisions of time, past, present, and future, while a moon's crescent, above the central eye, marks the measure of time by months, a serpent round his neck the measure by years, and a second necklace of skulls with other serpents about his person, the perpetual revolution of ages, and the successive extinction and generation of the races of mankind; his hair is thickly matted together, and gathered above his forehead into a coil; on the top of it he bears the Ganges, the rush of which in its descent from heaven he intercepted by his head that the earth might not be crushed by the weight of the falling stream; his throat is dark-blue from the stain of the deadly poison which would have destroyed the world had it not been swallowed by him on its production at the churning of the ocean by the gods for the nectar of immortality; he holds a tri-śūla or three-pronged trident [also called Pināka] in his hand to denote, as some think, his combination of the three attributes of Creator, Destroyer, and Regenerator; he also carries a kind of drum, shaped like an hour-glass, called Ḍamaru: his attendants or servants are called Pramatha [qq. vv.]; they are regarded as demons or supernatural beings of different kinds, and form various hosts or troops called Gaṇas; his wife Durgā [otherwise called Kālī, Pārvatī, Umā, Gaurī, Bhāvanī &c.] is the chief object of worship with the

Śāktas and Tāntrikas, and in this connection he is fond of dancing [see lāṇḍava] and wine-drinking; he is also worshipped as a great ascetic and is said to have scorched the god of love [Kāma-deva] to ashes by a glance from his central eye, that deity having attempted to inflame him with passion for Pārvatī whilst he was engaged in severe penance; in the exercise of his function of Universal Destroyer he is fabled to have burnt up the Universe and all the gods, including Brahmā and Viṣṇu, by a similar scorching glance, and to have rubbed the resulting ashes upon his body, whence the use of ashes in his worship, while the use of the Rudrākṣa berries originated, it is said, from the legend that Śiva, on his way to destroy the three cities, called Tri-pura, let fall some tears of rage which became converted into these beads: his residence or heaven is Kailāsa, one of the loftiest northern peaks of the Himālaya; he has strictly no incarnations like those of Viṣṇu, though Vīra-bhadra and the eight Bhairavas and Khaṇḍo-bā &c. [RTL. 266] are sometimes regarded as forms of him; he is especially worshipped at Benares and has even more names than Viṣṇu, one thousand and eight being specified in the 69th chapter of the Śiva-Purāṇa and in the 17th chapter of the Anuśāna-parvan of the Mahā-bhārata, some of the most common being Mahā-deva, Śambhu, Śaṃkara, Īśa, Īśvara, Mahēśvara, Hara; his sons are Gaṇeśa and Kārtikeya, ĀśvŚrS.; MBh.; Kāv. &c.; RTL. 73; a kind of second Śiva (with Śaivas), a person who has attained a partic. stage of perfection or emancipation, MBh.; Sarvad.; śiva-linga, L.; any god, L.; a euphemistic N. of a jackal (generally śivā, f. q. v.); sacred writings, L.; (in astron.)
