'the sacrificial Veda', the collective body of sacred Mantras or texts which constitute the Yajur-veda (these Mantras, though often consisting of the prose Yajus, are frequently identical with the Mantras of the Rig-veda, the Yajur-veda being only a sort of sacrificial prayer-book for the Adhvaryu priests formed out of the Rig-veda, which had to be dissected and rearranged with additional texts for sacrificial purposes; the most characteristic feature of the Yajur-veda is its division into two distinct collections of texts, the Taittirīya-saṃhitā and the Vājasaneyi-saṃhitā, q.v.; the former of which is also called Kṛishṇa, i.e. 'Black,' because in it the Saṃhitā and Brāhmaṇa portions are confused; and the latter Śukla, i.e. 'White,' because in this, which is thought the more recent of the two recensions, the Saṃhitā is cleared from confusion with its Brāhmaṇa and is as it were white or orderly; the order of sacrifices, however, of both recensions is similar, two of the principal being the Darśa-pūrṇa-māsa or sacrifice to be performed at new and full moon, and the Āśva-medha or horse-sacrifice; cf. Ayodhya-k^o; 3. Aranya-k^o; 4. Kishkindhya-k^o; 5. Sundara-k^o; 6. Yuddha-k^o; 7. Varuṇa, m. (once in the TĀr. varuṇā) 'All-enveloping Sky,' N. of an Āditya (in the Veda commonly associated with Mitra [q. v.] and presiding over the night as Mitra over the day, but often celebrated separately, whereas Mitra is rarely invoked alone; Varuṇa is one of the oldest of the Vedic gods, and is commonly thought to correspond to the Oṽpavōs of the Greeks, although of a more spiritual conception; he is often regarded as the supreme deity, being then styled 'king of the gods' or 'king of both gods and men' or 'king of the universe'; no other deity has such grand attributes and functions assigned to him; he is described as fashioning and upholding heaven and earth, as possessing extraordinary power and wisdom called māyā, as sending his spies or messengers throughout both worlds, as numbering the very winkings of men's eyes, as hating falsehood, as seizing transgressors with his pāśa or noose, as inflicting diseases, especially dropsy, as pardoning sin, as the guardian of immortality; he is also invoked in the Veda together with Indra, and in later Vedic literature together with Agni, with Yama, and with Vishnu; in RV. iv, 1, 2, he is even called the brother of Agni; though not generally regarded in the Veda as a god of the ocean, yet he is often connected with the waters, especially the waters of the atmosphere or firmament, and in one place [RV. vii, 64, 2] is called with Mitra Sindhu-pati, 'lord of the sea or of rivers'; hence in the later mythology he became a kind of Neptune, and is there best known in his character of god of the ocean; in the MBh. Varuṇa is said to be a son of Kardama and father of Pushkara, and is also variously represented as one of the Deva-gandharvas, as a Nāga, as a king of the Nāgas, and as an Asura; he is the regent of the western quarter [cf. loka-pāla] and of the Nakshatra Śata-bhishaj [VarBṛS.]; the Jains consider Varuṇa as a servant of the twentieth Arhat of the present Avastarpiṇi, RV. &c. &c. वि 2. vī, n. an artificial word said to be = anna, ŚBr.

वि 3. vī, ind. (prob. for an original dri, meaning 'in two parts'; and opp. to sam, q.v.) apart, asunder, in different directions, to and fro, about, away, away from, off, without, RV. &c. &c. In RV. it appears also as a prep. with acc. denoting 'through' or 'between' (with ellipse of the verb, e.g. i, 181, 5; x, 86, 20 &c.) It is esp. used as a prefix to verbs or nouns and other parts of speech derived from verbs, to express 'division', 'distinction', 'distribution', 'arrangement', 'order', 'opposition', or 'deliberation' (cf. vi-√bhīd, -śish, -dha, -rudh, -car, with their nominal derivatives); sometimes it gives a meaning opposite to the idea contained in the simple root (e.g. √kṛi, 'to buy'; vi-√kṛi, 'to sell'), or it intensifies that idea (e.g. √hiṃs, 'to injure'; vi-√hiṃs, 'to injure severely').

The above 3. vī may also be used in forming compounds not immediately referable to verbs, in which cases it may express 'difference' (cf. 1. vi-luksha-ṇa), 'change' or 'variety' (cf. vi-citra), 'intensity' (cf. vi-karāla), 'manifoldness' (cf. vi-viḍha), 'contrariety' (cf. vi-loka), 'deviation from right' (cf. vi-tila), 'negation' or 'privation' (cf. vi-kaccha, being often used like 3. a, nir, and nīs [qq. vv.], and like the Latin dis, se, and the English a, dis, in, un &c.); in some cases it does not seem to modify the meaning of the simple word at all (cf. vi-jāmi, vi-jāmātri); it is also used to form proper names out of other proper names (e.g. vi-koka, vi-prithu, vi-vijā). To save space such words are here mostly collected under one article; but words having several subordinate compounds will be found s.v. - kaṇsā, f.
